

Comparisons

One thing might be comparable to another, but seldom if ever is a thing comparable to every other thing.

Comparison is an artificial construct that humans create and use to arbitrarily evaluate a thing.

Nature does not compare things. Things simply exist among other things and interact however they are compelled to by some force of nature.

People use comparison to manipulate a determination that builds or reinforces their cognitive comfort. Or they compare to qualify one or both things. This is most common when cognitive balance is not negative and has no influence on the person's current cognitive balance.

Comparison has a similar quality as 'should'. Should insists of the declaration that a thing is intrinsically not what it in fact is. A thing is incapable of being anything other than what it actually is.