

We talk in short hand, and to a degree we also think in short hand. More than anything it is context that moves us closer to the meaning of the short hand. With out context or other toos that imbuh short hand with meaning, our short hand is so ambiguous as to lack meaning.

'I love you.' has a huge number of meanings that span a huge number of situations. If fact, often the actual intended meaning is lost in any number of plosible but wrong meanings.

Sharing a larger vocabulary would help, but that is simply more sort hand that has its own reliance on context.

I think that the better solution is to take the extra time required to include the context.